

KEY FACTS ON SOCIAL JUSTICE GRANTMAKING

Social justice-related grantmaking by U.S. foundations climbed to nearly 15 percent of giving in 2008. Over most of the past decade, social justice funding had remained fairly steady, generally accounting for between 11 and 12 percent of grant dollars awarded by foundations included in the Foundation Center's annual grants sample.<sup>1</sup>

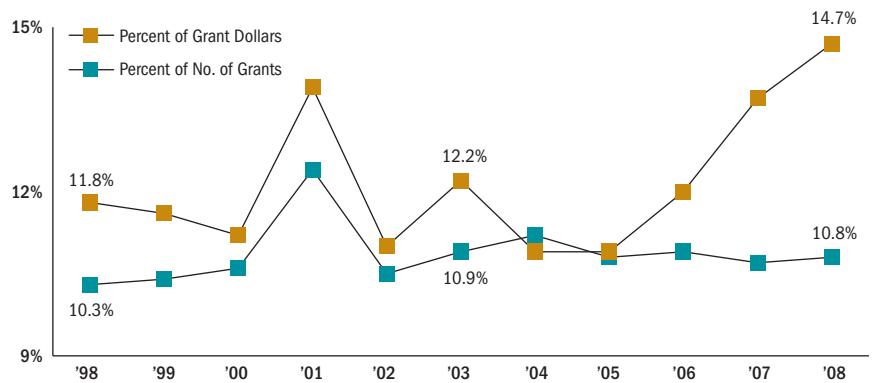

A primary factor contributing to the increase in the share of giving targeting social justice-related activities was the ascension of the nation's largest grantmaker—the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation—into the role of the country's top social justice funder. In 2008, the foundation awarded 22 of the nation's 25 largest social justice grants.

Foundations' social justice giving spans all areas of activity, from human rights to environmental justice to the arts. Consistent with past trends, the biggest share of social justice grant dollars awarded in 2008 (31.1 percent) went for economic and community development, followed by health care access and affordability (20.8 percent) and human rights and civil liberties (11.2 percent).

Key Facts on Social Justice Grantmaking is the latest Foundation Center resource to provide funders and practitioners with objective, quantitative benchmarking of foundation support for social justice-related activities. "Highlights" of the Center's most recent social justice funding benchmark study, Social Justice Grantmaking II: An Update on U.S. Foundation Trends (published in 2009), are available at foundationcenter.org/gainknowledge.

Social Justice Philanthropy for a New Era

A late 2008 study commissioned by the Foundation Center found that, following years of declining faith in the efficacy of social justice philanthropy, both grantmakers and practitioners were showing renewed optimism. Interviews with 19 leading social justice funders and eight advocates/activists provided a set of key recommendations for advancing the social justice field, partially summarized below. For the full analysis, see Chapter 2 of Social Justice Grantmaking II (foundationcenter.org/gainknowledge).

The Funder Perspective

Grantmakers identified a dozen strategies for advancing social justice agendas, among them pursuing “small tent” collaborations, which contain fewer groups that can be more nimble and disciplined and provide a higher level of trust and mutual accountability; focusing on community organizing but questioning the continued use of a “power analysis” framework by some organizations that ensures their stakeholders will remain outsiders; and being certain to not ignore the political sphere, as grassroots support alone rarely yields enough political leverage and expertise to significantly address larger social justice issues.

The Practitioner Perspective

Many of the practitioner leaders interviewed believe that progressives have yet to put forth an updated and broadly compelling vision of the common good. Nonetheless, social justice organizations are making changes to move social change work away from taking adversarial stances and toward promoting negotiation. Among several recommendations for social justice funders, practitioners suggested that they engage in more strategic partnerships, support community organizing, and work to build connections among think tanks, intermediaries, and small community-based organizations.

The Role of Atlantic Philanthropies

The information on social justice grantmaking presented in this fact sheet focuses on U.S.-based private and community foundations. As a result, it excludes grantmaking by public charities that make social justice-related grants, as well as non-U.S. social justice grantmakers with a significant presence in this country. Arguably, the largest of the latter funders is the Atlantic Philanthropies.

Established more than two decades ago by Duty Free Shops co-founder Charles Feeney, the Atlantic Philanthropies seeks “to bring about lasting change in the lives of disadvantaged and vulnerable people.” The foundation focuses its grantmaking in the areas of aging, children and youth, population health, and reconciliation and human rights and awards grants for the benefit of seven countries—Australia, Bermuda, Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland, South Africa, the United States, and Vietnam.

A spend-down foundation, Atlantic plans to award approximately $350 million per year until it completes active grantmaking in 2016.

Defining and Tracking “Social Justice Grantmaking”

For the purpose of this report, social justice philanthropy is defined as “the granting of philanthropic contributions to nonprofit organizations based in the United States and other countries that work for structural change in order to increase the opportunity of those who are the least well off politically, economically, and socially.” For the full social justice philanthropy working definition and background on its development, see Chapter 1 of

Social Justice Grantmaking II (foundationcenter.org/gainknowledge).

To track grantmaking trends, the Foundation Center mapped this definition to its subject-based grants coding system. Because the system is objective, grants that met the social justice coding criteria were included regardless of whether funders may have considered them to be related to social justice.
